I'm a big fan of Alison Green's blog, Ask a Manager, where she doles out thoughtful advice and tough love to readers. Though I've never worked at a nonprofit, I decided to read the book and see what I could learn about management in general. Trust me, whether or not you work for a nonprofit, if you currently manage people or aspire to be a manager, this book is a great resource. I have managed people before, but I tend to care more about the people than the business. Not the worst trait in the world to have, but not always effective, either. When I became a manager, there wasn't any sort of training available to me at my company. As I've progressed through other companies in the role of instructional designer charged with creating management training, I've found that to be the norm. We promote people because they're really good at their jobs, when we should be looking beyond that to see if they will make effective leaders who can motivate others. Alison and co-author, Jerry Hauser, present information in a very accessible way. I had never thought of management as getting things done through others. After I read that, I thought, of course! I knew that, as a manager, the buck stopped with me, but my first management experience was in a company where managers still carried the full workload of a regular team member and sort of had power over their direct reports. Sort of? Yes, we could try to enforce rules and such, but the company was always so afraid of being sued, consequences were rarely imparted and almost never upheld. The book is divided into three parts: Managing the work, managing other people, and managing yourself. There's clear guidance on how to balance being hands-on while being hands-off.
